The Twenty Amino Acids The twenty amino acids (that make up proteins) each have assigned to them both three-letter (can be upper or lower case) and one-letter codes (upper case). This makes it quicker and easier for notation purposes and are worth learning. In chemical terms, proline is, therefore, an imino acid, since it lacks a primary amino group, although it is still classed as an amino acid in the current biochemical nomenclature, and may also be called an "N-alkylated alpha-amino acid". The vertical axis shows the fraction of highly buried residues, while the horizontal axis shows the amino acid names in one-letter code. Image from the tutorial by J.E.
